

The Drowned Dead

Ye might have heard tell of Bonespit Rock. A more ill-gotten name has never been seen by any stretch of sand from here to Far Cathay. She's no rock, nor reef, neither, but that ten-mile stretch of river sand has claimed more ships than all the coast of Albion combined.

After th' loss of the Prince's ship with all hands, there was a life-station set out there, on that island. Oh, sure and it is a wind blasted patch of frozen sand in the midst of the Great Sea, but even so more'n a half-dozen families took the work. Cold, hard, unforgiving work, to be sure, but work far from any hungry creditor. There was men livin' out at that life-station 'til nearly the last war.

See, thought was that if we can't stop the wrecks, we might stop some from dying. Those families they were to man the light out there, and keep a weather eye open for any ships as might stray too close. Too close in a storm. Too close in the fog. Too close in the night.

And when that lovely little barquentine run aground, well, then it was all men to the boats, wasn't it? Ye'd have to drag one of those long an' heavy clinker-built boats all along that ten mile of sand 'til ye came out a straight line ashore from the wreck. Hard and slogging work on a stormy night, let me tell you. Enough to break a soul, if not a back. But along along, you'd spy her, grinding to shreds and splinters on the sand. Grounded two miles out.

Oh, it's shallow off Bonespit Rock. And a man doesn't swim one mile there in the cold waters, much less two. Water there means death. Frozen corpses washed up on the sand.

Then came the rowing. To pull. Eight men against the storm. To pull for yer life, and for those wrecked, too. To row against the worst wind and wave and water... Water as could come, storm-driven, and smash right up over your bows, drag one of those eight men from where he sits and away over the side. One bare mile from shore, half-way there, and that's exactly what happens.

And then ye've a choice, haven't you? See, there's them out there. You can see them hanging from their rigging, you can almost hear their cries, carried off and eaten by the wind. That dozen men out there, they will die if you don't reach them. If you don't row.

But then there's that man there in th' water, isn't it? He's practically a neighbour or better. You KNOW him. You see him every day. You can hear him shout from where you sit and you know that he will die if you don't turn back.

Oh, it's a very hard choice.

And they made their choice, that night.

They got every single one of them men off that barquentine. They fought against the storm, and got every man off that ship. Got them to shore. Got them fed. Got them clothed. Got them shelter. Got them warm. Got word back to th' mainland and eventually, six months later, got them home.

Now, if this were some fire-side tale, if this were some lonely ballad sung for a beer, if this were some story told by a prancing noble, we'd here something dramatic like "one year to th' day," or "just before the next big storm."

Nothing like. Nothing so poetic.

Nine months less a week. Nine months less a week - oh, not the next wreck to be sure. There were plenty. No, but the next wreck that is in near about the same place. Heh. Ye look at a chart of Bonespit Rock, and they're piled up on each other there like ninepins. These two could ha' been touching. A lovely brig she was, this one, all in blue.

They dragged out the boat, and they dragged down the beach, and they fought the wind, and they hit the water, and they started to row. They could see those ten men out in the riggin'. And they pulled.

But they were losing.

They were barely half-way there. Bare a mile out from shore, and it looked like the weather would win. Only seven men, now, with the loss the year before. Seven men now, to fight against that wind and wave and water. And seven men seemed not to be enough. Only a mile out, and it looked like they'd have to turn back.

And sudden there is a wet slap, like a split fish thrown down on a dock, and two hands grab hold the gunnels, and pull up from the water. Two boots smash down in the bilge. Two boots filled with the worst, seaweed-cruste'd, stench-gutted, rotted slap of canvas ye've ever seen in all your life. And THEY all know what's going on, right?

It's OBVIOUS.

He's come back for revenge!

And they're all near for over the side. With certain death in the one mile swim to shore and near-certain death behind with the dead man in the boat--

Near-certain. Near-certain. Maybe that was it. That was enough. Enough to get them to pause. To pause long enough to see, before all men into the drink, that what he'd done, what he'd DONE, see, was picked up his oar, taken his old seat, and started to ROW.

Well, with certain death in th' swim to shore and now less certain death behind (and likely a bit o' liquid courage), they racked to benches, and started again pulling on the oars. And don't let me make ye think it was easy, now, some walk down th' Mordheim Piers, no. It was a hard and brutal fight. But now, but NOW, with eight men rowing, now they made headway. With eight men pulling, now they fought along. With eight men pulling, they dragged their boat out to that little ship, and got all ten men off her, and headed 'em back to shore.

Now I know what you're thinkin'. Those seven men, I wouldn't believe a word they say. There they are, livin' in the middle of nowhere, some of the worst conditions known to man. They're wracked with guilt. Rowin' past the very place they less than a year gone left their own man to die. I wouldn't believe a word they say.

And I don't.

Those ten men they rescued. They brought those seven up on charges. They had them nearly hanged for murder. Because half-way back to shore, only a mile off, one of them rowing stands up, steps over the side, drops below the water and he's GONE. And no matter how hard they argued, how hard they struggled, how hard they fought, those ten men couldn't get these seven men to turn back.

It's not until the trial hit the mainland, oh, a dozen years before the last war, that we got the whole of the story. Those ten are where I heard this story from. Them I might believe.

So watch yourself out there, on th' water.

The water is a hungry and demanding master. Whether the far seas, or the Stir River, she devours ships and devours souls. Knowing this, you still plan to sign aboard?

Very well then. Sign here. Aye, or make your mark as you are able.

No, son, I don't care what you think you are running from. Love, loss, or debts, it makes no mind to me. Once you are aboard, you belong to this ship, see.

I know you'll work, and I know you'll learn. 'Cause if you don't, then we ALL drown, and that, young buck, includes YOU. That's YOUR life hangs in the balance, then. Mark well, learn well. Work well.

Wages? Aye, once we are back ashore. More often in a river-boat than them that put to sea. Fear not. You'll have coin enough to buy drink, and coin enough to buy love.

As long as you live.

As long as you live.
